Hey, how is everyone doing? It's tough being on the "horns of a dilemma".

You're damned if you do and damned if you don't.

We haven't heard from you following my last memo. The press said I was trying to bully you; obviously that is a misnomer. After all you are the duly elected representative of your constituents and you know what is best for them. Don't you?

I understand. You made a lot of promises to your constituents and you fully intend to get around to addressing those promises after you handle all those requests from heavy donors, lobbyists and other special interests that give you money, pay for your meals and otherwise entertain you.

Of course it's all to protect your career. You worked hard and sucked up with a lot of people to get into office and it's not easy playing with smoke and mirrors to get both the breadcrumbs that your leadership feeds to you to bring home so you look good while you betray your responsibilities to your constituents. After all isn't that what public service is about, protecting your incumbency?

This year's political revolution is turning that sweet life upside down, isn't it? The rules are changing. Your leaders and peers in Washington and Albany are really out of sorts, suffering irregular bowel movements. They see that they are losing their grip on the populace that they thought would go on forever. They're scared to death about becoming irrelevant, losing their power and apparent respect.

The people recognize that the elites put their pants on one leg at a time, just like they do.

So what will you do? Will you continue to listen to your "leadership" tell you to "forget about what your constituents want, stay neutral, we'll rig the convention, win in the end and everything will be back to normal"?

Really! Open your eyes. Ed Cox, Al D'Amato, Karl Rove, Mitt Romney and the other Washington and Albany elites, facing the remainder of their careers as "has been's," have turned into irrational, desperate Looney Tunes looking to destroy the party they think they own before they will let Donald Trump be President.

Can you imagine that their brazen elitism has brought them to the point where they have completely forgotten that they do not own the Republican Party? The people own the party-- and they now want the insiders booted out the front door.

This is our last request that you join Trump for President and try to preserve what's left of your pathetic careers in government.

Whatever you do staying neutral is not an option. Pick a horse in the race and you may salvage some of your constituents' respect for you. Not choosing paints you as a coward.

The bus is leaving the station very soon. Get on, or you'll be left behind.
